Xantippe (zan tip e) a rural locality situated 33km east of Dalwallinu and is the only locality name within Australia that starts with X. As it is not actually a town an individual postcode has not been allocated but is covered by the Dalwallinu postcode, 6609.

The dictionary defines Xantippe as (5th century bc), wife of the philosopher Socrates. She is remembered for allegedly bad tempered behaviour towards her husband. Research also shows the name has another meaning of “looking for water from a deeper well” which ties in with the Gnamma holes in the area.

Xantippe Nature Reserve

The Xantippe nature reserve is a popular spot for people wanting to visit the locality. During the spring months the reserve is alive with wattle and wildflowers. A climb to the top of the rock gives you a 360 degree view of surrounding farms.

The reserve is home to the Xantippe Water Tank, one of 11 similar tanks built throughout the wheatbelt. Work on the concrete tank commenced in 1923 and was completed in 1927. The tank was originally intended to supply water to the town of Dalwallinu, unfortunately they had trouble pumping the water over the hills. In later years the tank supplied water to the surrounding farms. The tank is unusual in the fact that water flows along the pipe, level with the bottom of the tank, then flows upward to enter the tank at the top. A walk along the track following the pipe will take you to the granite outcrop where the water is collected, a low wall has been erected to channel the water from the rocks into the pipe.
